How to bet on Australian football correctly?

We define "home" and "guest" teams.

In Australian football, there are pronounced "home" and "away" teams. Since one of the main bets in this sport is on the outcome of the match, the player needs to carefully study the statistics of the games of the teams meeting and find out which of them feels more comfortable taking the opponent at home, and which, on the contrary, plays better in matches away.

The favorite does not always win with the expected difference.

As in any other sport, there are more titled and strong teams in Australian football, and there are outsiders. When such teams meet with each other, the coefficient for the victory of a stronger team is not very high, but the handicap for it is quite impressive. At the same time, it often happens that the underdog actually turns out to be not as weak as the bookmakers assumed, and provides a worthy resistance to the favorite.

The weather may affect the outcome of the game.

The number of points scored by teams per game in Australian football is always different — on average from 150 to 200. Therefore, a player should approach betting on total with all care and caution, carefully considering all the information about the teams meeting before the match.

Australian football is a very fast and contact game. Weather conditions are unlikely to affect the outcome of the match, but rain, for example, significantly reduces the effectiveness of games. Therefore, it may be worth playing on TM (total less) if bad weather is expected during the game.
